Mr. GARNET addressed the meeting at considerable length, and with his wonted eloquence, good sense, and good feeling, energetically and yet discreetly pleading the cause of his oppressed brethren. Having laid bare the system of American Slavery, and shown that it exceeded in atrocity all other forms of slavery ever looked upon by the sun, he clearly demonstrated the fact that its life-blood was the consumption of its products by foreign countries, and especially by Great Britain, the best customer of the slaveholder. He earnestly exhorted the meeting to refrain, as far as possible, from the use of slave-labour produce, and particularly recommended the people of England to consume the products of their West Indian colonies, which they had exposed to competition with slave-labour, and which it was their bounden duty to support. He trusted, therefore, that they would feel themselves under an obligation to compensate their countrymen in the West Indies for their sacrifices, by preferring their product to those of slave labour. Justice, consistency, and Christianity demanded of them this preference. (Applause.) In conclusion, Mr. Garnet, although unfavourable to the adoption of physical force in the cause of freedom, expressed the pleasure which he felt in beholding on his right the brother of the Hon. Capt. Denman (of the African squadron), and the son of the late Lord Chief-Justice of England. (Cheers.)
